State Ponders Aid To Junior Colleges

By VINCENT THOMAS
Assemblyman, 68th District

California's common property taxpayers are still the primary source of support for our growing number of junior colleges. A move is on foot, however, which may shift about half their burden to the broader tax resources of the state general fund. When the Master Plan for Higher Education was formally adopted by the Legislature in 1960, strict lines were drawn to separate the responsibilities of the University, the state colleges, and the junior colleges. Only students ranking in the upper eighth of their high school classes are to be eligible to enroll in the University. Only those in the upper 40 per cent (to be reduced to 33 per cent by 1970) of their classes may enter the state colleges.

JUNIOR COLLEGES were left free to enroll any student with a high school diploma, or any adult over 21 whom the college believes might profit by its instruction. The Master Plan recognized that property taxes could no longer be expected to carry the largest share of junior college costs, and recommended that the state share be gradually increased to 45 per cent of the total.

The subcommittee on higher education of the Senate Fact Finding Committee on Education just lately held a hearing on problems of junior college finances. Representatives of the state junior college association, the departments of education and finance appeared to testify, as did our legislative analyst.

THE SUBCOMMITTEE was informed that at present junior colleges receive less than 25 per cent of the funds from the state, as compared to 60 per cent for elementary schools, 40 per cent for high schools, 65 for the University, and 85 for the state colleges. It was also told by the department of finance that support of junior colleges by local taxation in western states is at least twice, and in some instances, four times the percentage from that source in other states.

The subcommittee was informed that salaries for teaching personnel at the University and the state colleges are materially higher than those in the junior colleges, which makes it difficult to attract and hold competent staff. Facilities, both buildings and equipment, are much less costly at junior colleges. As a result, it was alleged, the state government can save millions of dollars by diverting students from state operated educational institutions to the junior colleges.

"SOME PEOPLE will challenge this statement and confuse facts by saying that junior colleges operate very expensive programs," it was asserted. But official records were cited, showing that the average cost per student year in autonomous college districts for 1960-61 was only $567. Comparable figures for the University and state colleges are not available, but some statistics published by the legislative analyst show that "lower division" costs at the University campuses comparable to those of junior colleges vary from $100 to $200 below this average.

The spokesman for the department of finance reported that the Master Plan contemplates the diversion of 50,000 students to the junior colleges by 1975. He admitted there appears to be a clear-cut state responsibility to finance the added burden caused by such diversion.

HE DECLARED that the fiscal problem must be worked out on a gradual basis unless a drastic change in the state tax program is considered. He forecast that the cost of raising state support for junior colleges to the proposed 45 per cent rate would equal $30 million a year by 1975.

Our legislative analyst urged that several steps in the interest of more economical junior college costs be taken to help solve the problem. Elimination of duplication and competition between types of institutions, closer control of adult programs, and tighter standards for admission and retention of students were his principal suggestions.
